A Sporting Appeal for South Africa's Children

Last update: 02/03/2010

A group of enterprising students from Brussels' Hogeschool-Universiteit (HUB) have embarked on a commendable project to create awareness about the less privileged children of South Africa during the World Cup due to take place this summer. They need your help.

The project, entitled "The Children of South Africa World Cup 2010", was launched because "making good actions makes us more human, proud of ourselves and gives us a better conscious since we have done something for someone in need," the group says.

For that reason, they intend to support a charity based in South Africa called SCORE by donating new and used sports equipment, and so have contacted Newshound to relay a plea for any football related item that you or your colleagues would be willing to donate.

The World Cup is an international football competition, which is organized by the Federation of International Football Association (FIFA), and it involves 32 countries from the four corners of the globe.

To most football fanatics, the World Cup is a glamorous hi-profile event that only happens ever four years, but behind what happens on the football field, there are many for whom the occasion is not so glamorous and this group of students would like to make it a similarly memorable moment for the country's children.

So if you feel like helping out, and you have a sporting item that would make a more than memorable event for less privileged children in South Africa, we encourage you to contact teamproject170@gmail.com who will do the rest and ensure your item makes it to South Africa.

But fear not, if you don't have any sports goods to give away but you still want to help us help the less privileged children, you can make a donation by sending money to the bank account number 0634 9068 5952.
